Improving Education

Increasing local control in education, encouraging parents to be more involved, and getting out of Common Core will make Idaho's schools even better. All five of my children have attended Idaho's public schools. I love their teachers and am grateful for all they do. However, Common Core has been a disaster in the classroom. I've seen how it stifles innovation and ties the hands of our teachers. This must change. We must set the highest standards for our children and give the local school districts and teachers the flexibility to achieve those standards. Our children will do more if we believe in them and expect more from them.

I believe parents, teachers and local school districts should be the engine charting the course for education in our communities, not bureaucrats in Boise or Washington. That's why I co-sponsored legislation to dismantle the U.S. Department of Education. By embracing local decision making and parental involvement, we will reach for excellence in education, cutting edge innovation, and create amazing opportunities for student achievement. We must ensure that every child has a meaningful opportunity beyond high school.

“Getting out of Common Core will make Idaho's schools even better.”
